Geno, a ten year old boy of Middle Eastern origin, is set the task of finding a new owner of the Mahabui mirror, an ancient two-sided mirror that has travelled the world in search of a true master. The splendid object has the power to grant wishes way beyond the imagination of any mortal.

Barry Standon was offered the magic mirror a week ago. A journalist by trade for the Ham and High newspaper, seen right through Geno's salesmanship and put it down to a boy's crazy imagination. Magic mirror, indeed!

A week later and Barry is kicking himself when he finds out Andrew Glen, an old school friend had visited the same shop and purchased the mirror. Now Andrew spends his time polishing his new BMW sports car and counts the seconds on his expensive Rolex watch.

How could Barry have been so stupid? It IS a magic mirror. Consumed with its possession, Barry breaks into Andrew's house and steals it.

When Geno sold the magic mirror to Andrew there was certain conditions to be met, rules had to be adhered to, and grave consequences would befall the owner if instructions weren't followed. As Barry slips down the slope of greed he starts to use the magic mirror in ways that are forbidden and soon finds out the true power of the ancient relic.
